- 1) The present invention relates to a separable rubber track used in a tank, and more particularly to a separable rubber track of a tank in which when a part of rubber molding is damaged during traveling, only the damaged part can be replaced.
- 2) Documents D1 to D5 disclose a connection link type rubber crawler and/or a method of connecting and repairing it.
- 3) More specifically, document D1(or D2) specifies a rubber crawler, wherein multiple reinforcing steel wires are buried in the width direction of a rubber endless belt-shaped body and many core metals serving as coupling members of drive rollers are arranged in the longitudinal direction. In this case, the crawler is divided at multiple positions in the longitudinal direction and connecting fittings are fitted on both ends of steel wire portions of split crawlers respectively. Document D3 describes a rubber crawler having a plurality of core metals buried with a fixed space relating to a rubber crawler main unit, and a reinforced layer buried in a lower part total unit of a blade part. Document D4 depicts a rubber crawler having a core embedded in the rubber crawler, a lug protrudingly formed on the ground side, a track link bolted to a bolt hole and joined with a link pin, and joining pieces embedded to protrude superimposed parts on the outer periphery side of a core wing part. Document D5 discloses production of a mold repairing a rubber crawler cut.
